Concept Note

Climate Change, as put in lucid terms by the United Nations, implies the long-term shifts in temperatures and weather patterns. These shifts possibly occur naturally or through variations of the solar cycle. However, post the industrial revolution and the advent of an ever globalizing and connected world understanding of the cause of climate change makes it crystal clear that human activities have been a massive driving factor contributing to climate change, through the usage of fossil fuels. The world has, over the course of the beginning of the 21st Century, experienced the drastic effects of climate change, the most recent phenomena being the surge of heatwaves all over Europe. Climate change is a beast that needs to be tamed because the cost of it running amok would be the destruction of human lives as well as the endangerment of the lives of the future generations.

The current international framework and agreements in order to control climate change include the Sustainable Development Goals, the UN Framework Convention on Climate Change and the Paris Agreement. Three broad categories of action common to all these frameworks include cutting emissions, adapting to climate impacts and financing required adjustments. However, the drastic effects of air pollution in major cities around the world, water pollution in the high seas and transboundary harm occurring due to the release of hazardous wastes call for change in the way the present environmental policies are globally implemented so as to ensure and provide sustainability both with regard to use of natural resources and ensuring that the drastic consequences of climate change does not put the future of humanity at risk.
